that, and the other. They don't even know what their young people say because they don't speak the same language, but young people are the tools that are used to fit any handle that a politician chooses to put on it. So now we're going to use a program to help our children because they mean so much to us, but we're going to use that which the young people, themselves, cannot participate in without violating the law. Why don't we sell dope and we'll get a lot more money? Open a house of prostitution and make sure that all of those in there, there are male prostitutes too, so I am not being chauvinistic, you'd make sure they're clean, they got all their shots; a person won't get busted in the head after taking advantage of the services made available, and let the state do it. This state has no principles. This state has no morals. This state is hypocritical and money makes it all go out the window and young people can be seen, they can be shown by our example that money buys everything. Money makes every thing all right. They're going to call a preacher here tomorrow morning, and instead of having him stand up and pray for you all sin-cursed souls, you're hell bound and you're going to knock sparks a mile high when you hit that fire, and instead of him praying for your sin-cursed souls, he is going to be muttering and mumbling God bless these people, let them all work together and do your will and guide the state, and do all these good things you want them to do, and he or she won't mention the gambling that you all approve of.

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Now isn't that terrible? How many of you all go out to these schools and you talk to these young people and boast about the gambling that the state approves of that you helped put in place? Boast about the fact that you want to use
